TALENT NURTURING

and its importance

Talent is defined as a natural aptitude or skill, one that is inborn in a child. Nurturing talents refers to helping people hone their talents. All children have at least one talent, but not all discover theirs during the course of their lives. This is something that can be changed. There are many factors at play that determine whether a child will discover and hone their talents.

It helps if there is a strong channel of communication between the children and parents so that the student can be open about what they want to learn. Caregivers should also take the responsibility to observe what activities the child performs as this indicates a natural predisposition.

As a child grows older, they might become more inhibited and lose the ability to pick up a skill as easily as they could have earlier. A child's early years are definitive in their adult development. For this reason, the involvement of parents and teachers is vital to nurturing a child's talent.

As important as the academic curriculum of a school is, a child's growth is incomplete without life skills, personality development, and without finding passion. Having something the child is passionate about is important to their overall contentment level because it adds meaning to one's life.
